Photo Courtesy: Google Maps with satellites and planes that photograph us from above and with cars equipped with cameras that take panoramic photos of almost every street in the world Google seems determined to record all aspects of our lives. And then post those detailed pictures online. Anyone who has access to the Internet can now see some of the most mysterious objects, fascinating animals and stranger people in the world. Look at this incredible selection of unusual images captured on Google Earth, Google Maps and Google Street View. Clearly, these snorkelers have never been said that water is an integral part of the diving experience. Thanks to their photo taken by Google Maps in Bergen, Norway, these two boys got the acclamation to sit on the side of the road covered in snorkeling equipment. Photo: Google Maps The two prankers are residents of Bergen Borre Erstad and Paul Age Olsen. After being informed that Google Maps'car would pass, the two men dressed and waiting. The pictures of the stupid snorkelers have gone viral, with the duo hitting different poses, reading magazines and playing in the street with forks. These toy pandas are in a park. These images come from the research base of Chengdu of Giant Panda Breeding, a structure designed to ignite panda passion. These adorable images were captured on Google Maps when you collected photos of Sichuan, China, and show happy pandas and games. Photo Courtesy: Google Maps clearly the center of Chengdu efforts to increase the panda population are working. The structure opened in 1987 with six pandas saved but had facilitated the birth of 124 panda from 2008. The center is also a popular tourist destination where visitors can see the cute creatures at their most romantic. Maybe the person who wrote "AHOLE" with an arrow had never heard of it. Having said "good fences make good neighbors". The owner of this sequim, Washington, the Earth and their neighbors seem to have unresolved problems. Photo Courtesy: Courtesy: Earth Mowed message was created when Blaine and Cindy decided Zechenely to paint their garage and an adjacent purple apartment. The neighbors saw red and insisted, the purple property was an eye, even the signature of a petition asked that their own ownership fees are lowered. While the neighbor was clearly not amused by color selection, Google Earth users got a football out of Feud. This giant atom could look like a kind of futuristic structure, but in reality it is the atomium, a Brussels, Belgium, the reference point built in 1958 for the Brussels World Expo to honor progress in sciences. The atom was the symbol selected to represent scientific results. Photo of courtesy: Google Earth the building should not have been raised after the world Expo, but it was kept because of his popularity. It is built in stainless steel and is 335 feet high. Tubes connect the five spheres of the building. Atomium is now a museum full of exhibition rooms, public spaces and a restaurant. It looks like a building that should be in Nazi Germany, but actually part of the US naval amphibious base in Coronado, California. Known as a naval amphibious base complex 320-325, the original 1967 original concept was very simple and did not take a form of swastika until the changes were made to the design. Photo of courtesy: Google Earth The original architect of the building said he simply thought of the complex like four L-shaped buildings although the navy announced plans to spend $ 600,000 to change recovery in 2007, the SWASTIKA design appears Still on Google Earth. In 2009, a Fishy harvest circle has sprung up in Oxfordshire, England. Someone had transformed a barley field into a jellyfish circle of 600 feet. The circle expert collected Karen Alexander told the telegraph that it was the first crop circle of jellyfish he knew and was three times larger than the traditional versions of these phenomena. Courtesy photos: Google Earth in addition to creating a unique piece of art, some Experts theorized that the giant jellyfish was created to predict a solar storm and that its tentacles and body parts represented Earth226; 128;s magnetosphere. Other crop circle analysts claimed that it symbolized human energy fields known as chakras. Located in Oxfordshire, England, the Uffington White Horse is a mystery. The 3,000-year-old prehistoric figure dates back to the Bronze Age, is thirty-seven metres long and was created by deep trenches filled with crushed white chalk. Filling the design with chalk, or "re-chalking", has been a local tradition for hundreds of years. Photo Courtesy: Google Earth The Uffington White Horse is a favorite among fans of the paranormal, who notices the unusually high number of crop circles found near the image. Whatever this abstract equine represents, the fluidity and movement in its design are undeniably beautiful. In Shikoku, Japan, the village of Miyoshi had a population decline. Its remote location makes it an unattractive choice for the younger workforce, and the town226; 128;A residents are slowly dying out. Seeing that the area where he lived was almost deserted, Ayano Tsukimi decided to honor his dead. Photo Courtesy: Google Maps by 2014, Tsukimi created 350 life-size dolls, each representing a dead inhabitant. While the dolls are found in several of the villas's shops, homes and schools, Tsukimi has put many close to the road to encourage visitors to pay homage to the deceased. Who's got a horse's head? Photos of someone walking around can be seen on Google Street View probably not only at this point, either. This photo was taken in the Hardgate district of Aberdeen, Scotland, where people refer to a mysterious man wearing a sweater and dark trousers as "Horse Boy." Photo Courtesy: Google Maps Dozens of people went to boast that they know Horse Boy is 128; It is the true identity, and dozens of people claim to be Horse Boy. In 2010, a story about Horse Boy More than a million visits. According to fans, this one-truck pony appeared in several Google Street View snapshots. The Headington Shark was commissioned in 1986 by the conductor of the local Radio Bill Heine. The shark of 25 feet is made of fiberglass and employed the sculptor John Buckley three months to build it. The Oxford City Council criticized sculpture, saying that the urban planning commission had not approved it. Photo Courtesy: Google Maps The offer of the municipality to move the sculpture into the local pool was refused. In 1992, the Department of the Environment decided that the shark could remain in the house. The house was purchased by the son of HeineÀ ç à in 2016 and is currently managed as Airbnb. It seems that Google Earth has spotted the primrose, a 16,000 ton-toned ship next to North Sentinel Island after meeting a storm on August 2, 1981. The ship was transporting feed for chickens from Bangladesh at Australia when it is sunk in the Gulf of the Bengal. Photo Courtesy: Google Maps but the story took a more frightening fold. An unwelcome tribe that kills strangers began to approach the ship. About 50 men of the tribe began building wooden boats and prepared to attack the primula with lances and knives. The crew was finally saved by a helicopter who led them to save. Google Street View happened to capture images of these particular pigeons walking along the road. The crazy crowds was actually just a group of students from the nearby Musashino Art University recruited by the Japanese blog Daily Portal Z to make a joke. Photo Courtesy: Google Maps to students were asked to dress up from birds and walking on the street just as he passed the car. The students' photos have become viral, and the group has been nicknamed the «People Japanese pigeon.â» Shows only the birds of a feather gather Party, Wayne and Garth! It seems the bizarre duo Waynes World has decided to take a walk down the street. street. From their homes to Aurora, Illinois, the two were spotted in Plymouth, England. Google Street View has captured them by spinning their iconic thousandstives of the 80s and carrying chopsticks and a guitar. Photo of courtesy: Google Maps The imaginary friends had loved characters from a live sketch Saturday night that has turned into a wildly popular film from 1992. So they were the two characters portrayed by Dana Carvey and Mike Myers in England? Like Wayne and Garth they would say: "No way! Way!" Google Earth captured the captivating images of the Cerne Abbas giant. Located in the village of Cerne Abbas near Dorset, England, the fearsome naked giant is 185 feet long and cumulates a large club. The white image of the chalk stands out against the surrounding lush vegetation. Photo of courtesy: Google Earth The Ethra of the giant of Cerre Abbas is unknown. Some historians believe that it represents an ancient Saxon or Hercules divinity, while other scholars believe that it could be a symbol of fertility. The figure is a scheduled monument supervised by the national trust of England and is also a popular British attraction. Anyone who has controls the images of the Antarctic offset, is certain of being deceived. What appears to be an island when seen from above on Google Earth is actually the upper part of an active volcano. For many years, the "island" island has been used for commercial whale and also served as a research station. Photo of courtesy: Google Earth commercial activities stopped when it was decided that working on an active volcano was too risky. During the 1960s, the volcano broke out twice in two years, demolition of buildings and leaving everything under the piles of Ash. Today, the island of deception is a popular tourist attraction. If you happen to read this in prison and are contemplating an escape, don't plan the Vacation When a Google Maps car is driving through the street. It seems that what google cameras can have collected while shooting in Gauteng, South Africa. Photo of courtesy: Google Maps This photo was In 2010 and shows a man in an orange jumpsuit that runs along a deserted road with a large empty field on the one hand and accompanied himself in the distance. While man has never been identified, certainly it seems that this boy is on rolling. A lot of Google Street View fans have been left to scratch their heads after seeing this photo of a woman on a penny-farthing (wide wheel bicycle) riding the road with a penguin stuffed animal in tow. But Cottesloe's premises, in Australia, were able to clarify confusion. Photo of courtesy: Google Maps according to sources, the cyclist is Champion Penny-Farthing Rider, Nicky Armstrong. Armstrong bounces his toy penguin, called "Peng", behind her to help stabilize her bike. Having something also stops launching if you have to come to a sudden stop. When she is not leaking with the Peng, the winner of the Practical Medal The Law. No, this plane didn't crash in the forest. It is a missed Boeing 727 passenger jet that was converted into a home. Although it is hidden from the trees on a 10-acre property, this Hillsboro, Oregon, House is one that you can find on Google Earth. Photo courtesy: Google Earth The house is Bruce Campbell's own property (I'm sorry, not the famous evil Dead Actor), which bought the plane for $ 100,000 in 1999. Campbell belongs to the recycling association of the air fleet recycling , which seems to reuse the old aircraft transforming them into homes or other unusual jobs or recreational spaces. With its unusual design, Campbell considers him a "Great Toy". Google Earth fans find themselves amazed on the beauty of the Badlands Guardians. Located in Alberta, Canada, the image seems to be that of an indigenous woman carved in the profile. But the figure of stone is actually the result of water and wind erosion. If seen The Guardian of the Badlands appears convex but actually concave. Courtesy photo: Google Earth The function was originally spotted on Google Earth by Lynn Hickox in 2005. The Badlands Guardian Guardian It was called "a geological marvel" and was listed by Time Magazine as one of the first ten images on Google Earth. If you like pineapple, you will definitely enjoy the maze in Dole Plantation. Google Earth has recorded some sweet images of the pineapple plantation, which is also a popular Wahiawa, Hawaii tourist attraction. According to Dole, the great maze develops on three acres. Photo Courtesy: Google Maps The spectacular spot boasts two miles of paths created by fourteen,000 Hawaiian plants. The winding passages lead visitors to secret stations that give clues on how to reach the center. In 2008, the Dole Plantation Labyrinth was declared the world's largest labyrinth and is currently one of the only permanent botanical labyrinths in America. Location © carving a traditional crop circle, the farmer Pedro Ureta planted the trees of cypress 7000 in memory of his wife, who died unexpectedly at the age of 25. The memorial guitar extends over two thirds of a mile and is created by cypresses and blue eucalyptus trees that highlight the strings of the guitar is 128; s. Photo Courtesy: Google Earth Ureteta Graciela's wife, once suggested planting a unique design on their property. But during their brief marriage, they never found the time to implement the idea. Crossed by his unexpected death, Ureta designed and planted the guitar forest to honor Graziela 128; s love of the instrument. If you're near Homestead, Florida, you should visit the mysterious Castle of Coral. Viewed on Google Maps, Coral Castle is more of a fortress. The bizarre structure was built around the 1920's by Latvian immigrant Ed Leedskalnin for his ex-girlfriend. Leedskalnin's love hoped that the young woman would join him in the United States. He never did. Photo Courtesy: Google Maps With Many Coralli blocks that weigh several tons, scientists are not exactly sure of how the Leedskalnin secretion was able to build Coral Castle alone. The bitter scapolo eventually transformed Coral Castle to a local restaurant attraction. At first glance, this photo on Google Maps might look like a bunch of zombies walking in an open field. But they're just a collection of scarecrows not so scary that they were spotted in Kainuu, Finland. The crowd of scarecrows was placed on the field in the 1994 as an artistic installation. Photo Courtesy: Google Maps The scarecrows belong to artist Reijo Kela, who created about 1,000 figures. He called his work Silent People. Villagers have become so fond of the Silent People who regularly fix scarecrows and change their clothes when wearing objects. Google Earth fans can't help but feel a little romantic after seeing pictures of this heart-shaped pond at Columbia Station, Ohio. No one knows if behind this precious pond there is a story different from that built by man and situated on a private property with a white driveway that surrounds the lovely mirror of water. Photo Courtesy: Google Earth When the 30-acre site was put up for sale, it was described as "luxurious landscaped decoration with a view of the heart-shaped lake in the front," along with a lake in the back, suite in-law and gazebo. The heart-shaped lake is a popular image on social media during Valentine's Day. John Travolta is a famous actor, but he is also an aviation enthusiast. Google Earth spotted two of his planes sitting outside his Florida estate near Ocala. The large property has its own private runway and taxiway, with two buildings adjacent to the house designed to cover the planes. Photo Courtesy: Google Earth In 2007 Travolta has been inserted into the Living Legends of Aviation, an association that recognises flight accomplishments. Travolta is so passionate about aviation that he wrote a book on flight and was also a pilot when Winfrey traveled on a private flight to the Australia. Although this icon can resemble something of the Leo king, actually it was created in 1933 to promote the Whipsnade zoo in bedfordshire. At 483 feet, it is the largest hill project in in The symbol is so big that it had to be camouflaged during World War II to prevent German pilots from using it for navigation. Courtesy photo: Google Earth in 1981 The lion looked like Grand Decked with hundreds of light bulbs to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the zoo. But after decades of neglect and excess, the icon got a makeover in 2018 when 800 tons of plaster were used in its restructuring. Just south of Mexico City in the Xochimilco canals is the island of dolls. The owner of the island placed the terrifying toys at various points in the 1950s to ward off evil spirits. More than fifty years later, CobWeb-covered dolls that are worn by time and time still hanging from trees and buildings. Courtesy photo: Google Maps Dolls were meant to drive out the spirit of a girl who supposedly drowned years earlier. Doll Island is now both a tourist attraction and a religious point where some go to leave offers for the deterioration of toys. This photo from Google Maps seems to show a Cambodian high school. Tuol Svay Prey was a school just outside the capital of Phnom Penh, but the building was taken over by the violent Cambodian politica l faction, the Khmer Rouge, and turned into a detention facility for political prisoners. Courtesy photo: Google Maps During the 70s, the building was renamed "S-21". Of the 14,000-people who were taken to S-21 as prisoners, only seven are known to survive. Today S-21 is called the Tuol Sleng Museum of Genocide and serves as the world center of memorial and education to help prevent future atrocities. When people saw this pentagram on Google Earth images, they're not sure what was going on in Kazakhstan. The Pentagram is often associated with witchcraft and satanic worship, leading some of the conspiracy to speculate that something nepharium was on foot. Photo of courtesy: Google Earth as it turns out, the symbol was more Soviet than satanic. The pentagram, which is 1,200 feet in diameter, was actually the Of a star-shaped park and a possible campsite dating back to the era in which Kazakhstan was part of the Soviet Union. During the Soviet era, the stars were popular symbols used on flags, posters and buildings. Holy perfect parking space! The roof of this building seems to have been reserved specifically for the Batcopter. Although it seems the perfect heliport, no one has still seen the chief crusader. The famous superhero probably thinks that the aerial base of Kadena, an American outpost in Okinawa, Japan. Photo Courtesy: Google Earth according to a spokesman for Kadena's aerial base, the symbol was placed on the roof from the 44th Fighter Squadron of the military aeronautics, which calls for vampire bats. No one knows who painted the roof logo, but it is believed to have been there since the years à ç ¨ 80. Eighty.
